Excerpt: . . . round the sun, she would eclipse the sun every time she came to the change; and be herself eclipsed every time she comes to the full: for an eclipse of the sun is occasioned by the dark body of the moon passing between the earth and the sun; and a lunar eclipse by the moon passing through the shadow of the earth, and thereby losing her borrowed light. But the moon moves in an orbit that is oblique to that of the earth; one half of it being on the north side of the ecliptic, and the other on the south; so that it crosses the earths road in two points, which are called her nodes, making with it an angle of 50 18: see fig. 5, Plate XLIII; where n m is the ecliptic, and c d the moons orbit; a the ascending node (generally marked a), where she rises to the north, and b the descending node (generally marked e), where she passes to the south, of the ecliptic. Now, though this orbit is a trackless path, that has no more substantial existence than the circle I make in the air with my hand, it performs a regular circuit round the zodiac retrograde, or contrary to the order of the signs, every eighteen years and 225 days; i. e. the node, or intersection, a, will in a year be removed to e, and the opposite node to. In another year the ascending node will...
