HE various and conflicting opinions which have so long prevailed amongst Christians, concerning this Greek version of the ancient Scriptures, must render an enquiry into its real rank and importance, amongst the most interesting topics of Biblical investigation. As the entire phraseology of the New Testament is formed on the peculiar style of the LXX, as all our doctrinal terms are taken from its vocabulary, whilst by far the greater number of its quotations are transferred from its text; it becomes of the utmost moment to decide, whether the primitive Christians were right, or wrong, in their opinions concerning it, and whether we are warranted in maintaining opinions contrary to those, which were held by all the Christian Fathers, till the days of Jerome. In all matters of faith and doctrine, as well as of discipline, a temperate...
