Not illustrated. 1849 Excerpt: . general, and his knowledge was so exact, that he was able to overthrow giant error, by a stone taken from every brook of. ancient literature. He exposed the ignorance of the Athenians by quotations from their own poets, and the bestiality, and abominations of the inhabitants of Crete from the mouth of their prophets. The Apostle was not afraid of profane learning. His scholarship, based on broad comprehensive principles, was employed in illustrating and advocating the Gospel of Christ Jesus. He knew, too, the exact estimate to be put on the learning of the times. In accommodation to existing prejudices, he designated philosophic discoveries as science, but guarded the statement by saying it was science falsely so-called. In order to defend the Gospel against the pretensions of science, he suggests vain deceit, as the synonym of philosophy, and administers a rebuke to the conceits of selfconstituted scientists in the memorable saying, Knowledge puffeth up. Had the Apostle lived in our day, when learned associations, like strolling players, are starring the provinces, he would doubtless have been called a pigmy, or likened to some other equally complimentary zoological atom; for the charity of the enemies of Christianity does not edify. But the Apostle s utterances go far beyond the regions of their inquiries, and will live and influence the human race for good when their speculations are buried and rotten and forgotten, In support of the position we have taken, that your studies should be general,...
